THE LOCK OUT OF THE PIANO MEN.
Three Thousand Mechanics Thrown out of work by About Five Hundred Strikers.

The contest between the piano-forte manufacturers in this city and their workmen continues. Monday the former to the number of thirteen, some of them representing the largest establishments, stopped their business and closed the doors of their manufactories against their old employees. Here is union of capital against union of labor, and we shall see how long the latter can hold out against the former.

The statements of Messrs. Steinway, with whom the other manufacturers now make common cause, are to be credited, and doubtless they are, that house in March, 1868, increased wages 25 per cent; in October of the same year made a further advance of 10 per cent; but in February, 1869, when another increase of 25 per cent was asked, the demand was resisted, and there was a general lock-out of the workmen, who were glad to do so. Now the whole thing, it appears, is to be done over again, at the dictation of the Piano-Makers' Union, an association of workmen.

It seems a rather dishonest, not to say a wicked, piece of business. The Union of the workmen has funds sufficient to support its members in idleness for about two months. With the resources of 4,000 men and their families to feed, its collapse is only a question of time, upon the general principle and nothing can come of nothing. The manufacturers are perfectly sure that in sixty days, through the operation of natural causes, the men must go to work again. They are determined to test the strength of the Union, and they say distinctly that the present question is not one of wages, but of principle.
